Violence on television has no effect on children...programming which may be considered objectionable by certain groups of people with different beliefs should be addressed in the home, privately. Violent programming for entertainment purposes is no more harmful than any other form of programming, as long as it is made clear that it isn't real to the children watching it -- a task which is up to their parents. Regulating children's exposure to certain material is the job of the parent, not the Federal government.